Transforming growth factor-beta 1 (TGF-beta1) is a prototypic multifunctional cytokine that plays essential roles in several processes, such as cell growth, cell differentiation, development and tissue repair. On the other hand, hypersecretion and/or hyperactivation of TGF-beta1 may cause tumor-promoting responses in cancers. This chapter is devoted to the current understanding of the pathophysiology of TGF-beta1 in cancers. Specifically, we will discuss the new aspects of our understanding of how TGF-beta1 promotes tumorigenesis, as well as the factors that regulate TGF-beta1 production and secretion in cancers.[Pathological anatomy of the lung. The 21st century]. The lung--that organ with such a small size--occupies a remarkable part of the human body. It has a multiplicity of functions, due to the many different cell types that it contains. The basic cellular composition is the same as that of the other organs. The main respiratory function is to provide the necessary gas for nutrition, oxygen being indispensable for the human body. The lung is also a site of many diseases. The mucous membrane epithelial lining, the conducting airways, the alveoli and the bronchial wall are the principal areas of pathological processes. These processes are due to numerous factors: the environment, genetic, inflammatory and infectious. The histological, clinical and functional knowledge of the lung is constantly developing. This review was performed in the Archives of Pathology, in 1999.WASHINGTON, D.C. - President Barack Obama presided over his final Cabinet meeting at the White House on Wednesday, saying that it was time to "turn the page" on two tumultuous years in office. Obama gave a firm "no" when
